SOUTELLE & BURR, PROPRIETORS.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 13, 1888.

It appears that there was an error in the returns sent out Tuesday night concerning the election in Boston. The Journal gives that a majority as 3,701. This is a crushing defeat for the Democrats everywhere.

New York has thirty-four Congressional districts and the Republicans carried nineteen and the Democrats eleven at the late election. The Republicans plurality in New York State on the Congressional vote was 20,181.

This is a time season of the year for the agitation of tariff reform. It is therefore well for the Democratic papers to study the advertising columns of THE WHIG before starting out in such a course as to give aid to the Republican party.

The New York Herald declares that all the Democratic papers which helped the Republicans most to success and will remain loyal to least while the Republicans have the Democratic party in power. The Herald is right.

Now that the Democrats have carried New York and Indiana, they would be glad to forget the tariff issue. But the Republicans want to fight it out on that line if they have to go all the way to Texas to find it.

The Democratic papers are trying to explain away the defeat of their party. The Republican papers are not trying to explain away their victory. They are content to let the people understand that they have won a glorious victory

"And you actually love the person? There is no mistake about that?" she persisted.

"I hold the proof myself," he answered, "and shall do so as long as I live, or until the truth comes to light."

She professed herself satisfied—quietly said that she would have been rather pleased if no such mystery had been hanging over him, nor could he in any way blame her for that.

"You will see my father when he comes in?" she asked. "He is at his club now, but he will be in to lunch."

"Oh! yes. I would like to see him and get it all settled as quickly as possible," Jim answered, with alacrity. "I can fancy the prospect of seeing her father was a much more congenial topic of conversation than the details of poor Owen's cruel murder and the likelihood of his brooding the murderer—young Tommy, to wit—unrewarded—to justice.

"I don't think he can object to me," he said, cheerfully. "My family and income are all right, and my record will give me a good character if he needs it. I'm glad, my darling, and more than ever now, that I always went in for a good character. It's a rum sometimes, when you can't do things that you see other fellows doing, and it's apparently none the worse for, but going straight pays in the long run. Hullo!" [illegible] "Not, all the while, that I ever calculated on any end at all. I don't want to blow my own trumpet in the least, but I've gone straight simply because I was everything that's ungodly."

"And I love you," said Nancy Earle, softly.

CHAPTER XXI.

A REASONABLE OBJECTION.

It was not more than half an hour after this that Mr Earle returned from his club, and entered the little room where his daughter and beautiful Jim were sitting.

Not like his daughter's visitor was Mr Earle—and not the very smallest idea would she entertain of him by name.

"And Mr. Beresford has wanted to see you, dear father," she said. "He wants to ask you something, so I will leave you a few minutes before I speak."

This implied that her father was to be in the window to join them at that meal, a hint they were not long upon.

"Well, Mr. Beresford," he said, as the door closed behind Nancy's retiring form, "you wanted to ask me something?"

He settled himself with his back to the fire with the air of a man who was accustomed to his comfort before and had no objection to guarding them in a pompous sort of way. Evidently he had no suspicion of the nature of Jim's request, and indeed his daughter had given him so little trouble in that way that it was hardly likely that he should know just what was coming, or he would undoubtedly have given Jim the loan of counterenance and body instead of being an aristocratic old gentleman.

"You wanted to ask me something?" he repeated, blandly.

"Yes, sir!" said Jim. "It is for your consent to my engagement to your daughter."

The ruby countenance of Mr. Earle colored looking on his fifth, simply thunder clouds.

"Eh, sir, I must say I regret very much at the time, she was staying at the Downs at Manthampton, and I should have come up to see you about it then only I felt it was a little hasty—a little premature, Beresford. I was not by any means sure that Miss Earle would be inclined to listen to me—and I intended to be in town during the autumn, and thought I might see more of her there. But to return, will you send the young fellow, or shall I call and get Nancy here, so I can simply say 'Yes' and be done with it?"

"Then, sir, what is it?" Jim cried, in infinite distress. "Not my character, I do hope for as to that my corresponding officer will speak for me, and I have been three years in his regiment, so he ought to know."

"Mr. Beresford," said the old man, gravely, "it is very painful for me to have to speak with greater plainness, will it not be best for us to consider the conversation at an end and your proposal declined?"

"I would rather hear your reasons for declining it plainly, sir," said Jim, with admirable coolness.

"Is that not what I asked Mr Earle

"Yes, sir," returned Jim, "that is so."

"Then I must speak out," said the old man, with a sort of groan. He hated everything unpleasant, and made a rule of shirking all disagreeables whenever possible. "Well, Mr. Beresford, I must tell you frankly that if you had come to me last autumn and asked for my daughter, I should, of course, have been willing, have considered myself, my family and your income a perfectly desirable and suitable match for her; but since that time a great deal has happened. You, for instance, have been dismissed since then on a suspicion of murder."

Jim fairly staggered back as the words passed the old man's lips.

"Mr. Earle," he said, hoarsely, "you don't—you surely can't believe that I committed that foul crime?"

"If I believed it," Mr Earle answered, "I should have asked you to go out of my house some minutes ago. As there is no fact—you were arrested on suspicion, and a verdict of willful murder against some person or persons unknown is returned. Do you not see that until the case is not at rest one way or the other, you are not, and never can be, a fitting husband for any time is liable to rise up against you, not a mere suspicion, but a lifelong danger which may overwhelm you? Do you think, Mr. Beresford, that I could or would let my young daughter so long into such a danger as that? No, sir, a thousand times, no! and let me tell you that although I may have misjudged ideas of love and honor, I think you have years with to love and honor her very poorly indeed by even dreaming of speaking of subjecting her to even a remote chance of such a misfortune."

Beautiful Jim looked as he felt, more staggered than ever, and, part of all, he felt that from his point of view the old man was right.

"You are right, sir," he said, "from your own point of view; but I swear to you, all the world, and not merely to you, that I am innocent of this crime, and I will prove it. Will you not give me a chance? Will you not withhold your consent for a few months, and then, if I fail, I will never trouble you more?"

"I will not forbid you, Mr. Beresford. No, on the contrary, I will say that although I would rather you did not address yourself, by secret writing, you had no attempt to marry my daughter, I will not oppose you, but will be content to remain neutral. Nancy has been about with her for the time to say, depend with you, well and good. If you care to come here now and again, when you are in town, I will not prevent it or forbid it. I dare say, under the circumstances, this is a convenient manner of proceeding, but I have always given my daughter the most absolute trust, and she is worthy of it in every way. You have yet to be cleared, and I believe you will be able to do so, but you have had the misfortune of the danger to which such a marriage would expose her—so I will wish you good-day."

"Sir," said Jim, holding out his hand, "you have been as merciful to me—as I never expected. But you have spoken to me plainly and well, and I honor you. You may depend upon it I never bring you any trouble. When I have cleared myself, as I will, I shall be in a position to marry, and I shall not ask you to do so. Good-by, sir, and thank you for your consideration of mine as it is. I will write to Nancy, and I will not trouble you with my presence."

Jim walked like a person in somnambulism. Hood's Sarsaparilla did one so much good that I wonder at them in my sleep. When I began taking Hood's Sarsaparilla I was feeling real miserable with dyspepsia, and so weak that at times I could hardly

PLEASANT AND PROMPT.

The happiest note of the character of failing pain-drive to be struck is shown by the fact that many eminent scientists have given their thoughts to the question. A notable example is the very thorough and exhaustive experiments made by Green Parley, one of the most eminent chemists of the time, who has been greatly interested in Prof. Horsford's investment. In his published report Parley says: "It is clear, though a great variety of experiments, and tried on both of the party and practitioner of the testing preparation of Prof. Horsford. The bread has to work is easily digested, and of the best flavor. I consider this invention as one of the most useful gifts which science has made to mankind. It is certain that the nutritive value of the flour will be increased ten per cent by this phosphatic preparation."
